Emily Wasuna, MPP

Emily Wasuna is a project manager with experience working complex healthcare and public policy. Emily works alongside subject matter experts to project manage the development of a curriculum suite, technical assistance engagements, help coordinate logistics and provide operational support for teaching and training efforts with local and national partners.

Emily plays a role in the development of content and resources for engagements. She was heavily involved in the development and production of the Medications for assisted treatment (MAT) best practices toolkit, a toolkit focused on helping providers and administrators establish MAT programs in a primary care setting. Emily also worked on a community asset mapping project for Regional One Health in Memphis, TN that informed the development of a publicly available, robust database of community resources, and helped foster cross-organizational partnerships with community-based organizations to improve delivery of care. Additionally, Emily led and managed the curriculum migration process for a learning management system utilized by student and professional learners nationally.

Emily has experience working with clients in different sectors such as Adventist Health, Allegheny County Department of Human Services, Providence Saint Joseph Health and Vital Strategies. In addition, Emily leads the special events programming at the National Center's Putting Care at the Center annual conference – a conference that highlights best practices from the field of complex care.

Emily is a graduate of Loyola University New Orleans where she earned a bachelor's degree in political science, and Drexel University where she received a master's degree in public policy.
